KLOEBER SANATORIUM

Green River Hot Springs, WA.

There was a total of 17 hot springs that comprised Green River Hot Springs, located about 60 miles from Seattle. When the Northern Pacific Railway built a station there in 1888, a bath house and hotel followed shortly thereafter. Dr. J. S. Kloeber thought the 132-degree Fahrenheit white sulphur water emerging from the springs would cure numerous health problems, so in 1900 he opened his Green River Hot Springs Hotel and Sanitarium. He advertised it as "The most perfectly appointed Health and Pleasure Resort in the West". I suspect there was more emphasis, and interest, in the pleasure resort part than in the health aspect. Bowling alleys, a shooting gallery, billiard, and card rooms were advertised, while the bath rooms with massage and Swedish movement were the health offerings. Rates ranged from $5 to $10 per week for the rooms, with meals at a modest additional fee.

Dr. Kloeber's Sanatorium operated for just ten years before being burned to the ground in August of 1910, by a forest fire.

Syracuse china made the sanitarium's china service which is described, and shown, in IDwiki. The gray green border is shown in the Syracuse pattern sample book as 'Flower Festoon 2200'. The winged lady on the dais that was used in the center of the plate along with "The Kloeber" "Green River Hot Springs" was used again on a sample plate that Syracuse made in 1915. On this sample plate all of the Kloeber information has been cut off in hopes that another prospective customer would take a fancy to the winged lady and order her for their crested china.

A note on terminology.

The terms sanatorium and sanitarium are interchangeable. However, sanitarium is primarily a North American word. The difference between the words is their origin, though it is not much of a difference. The word sanitorium is derived from the Late Latin word sanitorius, which means health-giving.

I spent some weeks at the Springs the past winter and take great pleasure in saying that both as a Sanitarium and Hotel it is in every way first class, and I believe is bound, under present management, to be the most popular place, either for the sick or well, on the Pacific Coast.
